Reading Assignments for Class Discussion

Required materials:

Friedman & Macaulay, Law and the Behavioral Sciences (2d ed 1977); Photocopied Supplement ("supp.").

The class meets for one hour and thirty minutes on Mondays and Wednesdays. Reading assignments usually are from 40 to 50 pages per class. Some are longer. A few are much longer. Notice that on March 17th and 19th, we will consider the tax compliance materials that begin in the supplement after page 244. This is a long assignment. The materials are reproduced on 183 pages. Please try to plan ahead so the assignment does not overwhelm you.

F, May 9 Final examination--1:00 p.m.

The examination will be a 3 hour, open-book, in-class essay-type one. Copies of old examinations and grading keys are on file in the Law Library. Students are urged to look at them in preparing for the examination.

Students may write a paper in place of the examination. The paper must be substantial (certainly no less than 25-30 pages but length will depend on the kind of paper) and deal with some of the major ideas of the course. It cannot be one you could have written without taking the course. However, experimental or field research is not required. Many law students find their job working for a law firm or some unit of state or local government supplies a topic; one can learn something about the course by reflecting on one's job. (If necessary, papers will remain confidential.) See the instructor as soon as you can to elect a paper in place of the examination and clear the topic. Papers are due on the day of the examination. Reasonable extensions of time will be given upon request, but the Law School Rules require that all papers be graded by the deadline for submitting Law School grades at the end of the examination period. Those graduating or seeking early admission to the bar should submit their paper early enough so that it can be read and a grade recorded in time.
